ESG UPDATE:

For more than 20 years the International Day for Biological Diversity (or World Biodiversity Day) has been held on May 22, exactly a month on from the better-known Earth Day, which we have talked about in past commentaries. The subject, biodiversity, is enjoying a well-earned moment in the limelight. Biodiversity is about more than the abundance of all types of life on Earth; it is also about things like the genetic diversity within species and the interactions that occur between species across ecosystems. And it is incredibly important because without sufficient biodiversity, there would be no life on Earth. We are dependent on this form of natural capital for almost all of our nutrition and a majority of our medicines. In fact, almost half of humanity's economic output is either moderately or highly dependent on the natural world. The irony of this dependence is that our economic output is great causing harm to biodiversity. Much like the interconnected issue of climate change, investors have begun to understand the biodiversity challenge and are consequently exploring how best to integrate associated risks and opportunities into their investment processes. For climate change, which can to a large extent be boiled down to quantitative metrics like greenhouse gas emissions, this has so far been a difficult but mostly successful endeavour. For biodiversity, which encompasses a broader basket of issues, it will likely be much harder. One relevant question is, how do you measure the value of species x in terms of species y? To arrive at material, actionable solutions to questions like these it will be critical that investors collaborate closely with experts from the world of academia who have been exploring this subject in great detail for many years.

In order to meet the volatility target, if markets become unsettled, the portfolio may reduce exposure to higher risk investments and increase exposure to lower risk investments such as cash and bonds. In addition, a proportion of the portfolio invests in a put option, which is used to provide the 90% protection level. The percentage invested in the put option will vary depending on market performance.
